

Photo: Whole Foods

Whole Foods suspends business with CP in wake of Thai labor abuse reports

Organic retail chain says it takes 'zero tolerance' on human rights violations.

Elisabeth Fischer

Published: 23.06.2014 17:32 Updated: 23.06.2014 17:36

United States-headquartered organic supermarket chain Whole Foods Markets has temporarily suspended its business with Charoen Pokphand Foods (CP Foods), following allegations of slavery in its shrimp supply chain.

"Whole Foods Market takes a zero tolerance approach to human rights violations anywhere in our supply chain, and our suppliers sign a contract to uphold that standard," the retailer said in a statement sent to IntraFish.

"We have suspended our business with CP Food Products until they are able to provide us with substantiation that they have properly addressed the issue of human rights violations in their supply chain," it said.

The supermarket chain, which has 368 stores in the United States, eight in Canada and nine in the United Kingdom, is following the example of Swedish retail chain ICA in Norway and Carrefour in France, which both stopped buying from the Thai supplier.

However, US retail giants Costco and Walmart have committed to continue to source shrimp from Thai suppliers, saying it's better to

Associated Articles

- Costco, Walmart still standing behind Thai shrimp
- Thai government: Shrimp report warped facts, exploited abused workers
- Wary US buyers begin moving away from Thai shrimp
- Thai labor abuse fallout: Norwegian retailer drops product sourced from CP Foods
- Thai frozen food sector denies slave labor
- Carrefour stops shrimp purchases from CP Foods following slavery report
- Seafood industry braces for impact from Thai shrimp expose stay and help create change than abandon the cause.

Following the damning allegations, which were reported first by The Guardian on June 11, CP Foods committed to eliminate slavery across supply chain.

---